The First Philosophers The Presocratics

The first pre-Socratic philosophers were from Miletus on the western coast of Anatolia. Thales (c. 624 - c. 546 BC) is reputedly the father of Greek philosophy; he declared water to be the basis of all things. Next came Anaximander (610-546 BC), the first writer on philosophy. He assumed as the first principle an undefined, unlimited substance without qualities (), out of which the primary ...

The first heirs of the Presocratics were the Sophists, who lived and travelled around the Mediterranean, selling their skills, throughout the second half of the fifth century. Like the Presocratics, they came from all over the Greek world, but (as far as we can tell from our surviving Athenocentric evidence) the focus of their activities was Athens.
